

The influence of BROADCAST RADIO, TV, and PRINTED media is incredibly powerful, and as such, should not be allowed to be in the hands of a few people or corporations. The FCC has the obligation to stop this obvious and blatant attempt to place the control of one form of mass communications in the hands of a small group whose interests are not America or its people.

The reasons our forefathers placed limitations on market influence are more important today than ever. The airwaves in America should be used for the benefit of all the American people. We are best served when there is the greatest diversity in the information available. We cannot allow corporations to increase their control of the information disseminated via Radio and TV broadcasting (including cable), printed and other media. We cannot permit limited communication of ideas, and a monopoly of thought. This does not serve the American people, but does move our great country one step closer to an abhorrent government that squelches freedom of thought and information.
